

the self-reflection

Throughout this term, I have learned a great deal to appreciate and recognize the various language resources available to myself and others. Such as understanding different language types and dialects and how cultural backgrounds are valuable assets in writing. During this semester, I developed specific strategies to improve my reading, drafting, revising, editing, and self-reflection processes. This includes honing my writing skills and becoming better at critically analyzing my own work. I learned to navigate and adapt to different writing situations through the conventions of the medium and rhetorical situation. This includes considering the needs and expectations of your target audience when writing your piece. Through collaborative assignments and activities, I gain experience working with others to improve my writing. Finally I've practiced using a range of resources, including library databases and the internet, to find credible and relevant sources for my writing projects. This goal focuses on strengthening my research skills and understanding how to incorporate sources appropriately. During the semester, I developed my ability to effectively evaluate, integrate, cite, paraphrase, summarize, synthesize, analyze, and cite sources. This includes understanding the importance of academic integrity and avoiding plagiarism.

I see writing as the process of expressing thoughts, ideas and information in words. It is a communication tool that helps us share ideas, convey information and express ourselves with others. Writing can include various forms such as articles, essays, journals, stories, reports, etc. to suit different purposes and audiences. Although I have a deeper understanding of the process of writing. But I think that the initial idea of writing is a draft, revision to final editing and completion, but then I realized that writing is a gradual development process that takes time and continuous effort. Realizing that writing is part of learning, I realized that writing is not just for homework or assignments, but part of learning. By writing, I can think and understand what I have learned more deeply and express it in a more critical way. During this semester, I have more opportunities to be exposed to and explore different writing genres and mediums, such as multimedia writing or a particular writing style. This expanded my knowledge and understanding of writing and made me realize that writing has flexibility and variety. By interacting and collaborating with classmates, teachers, or others, I get feedback and suggestions on my writing. This has helped me see multiple facets of writing and improve and improve my writing skills through feedback and collaboration.
